ANNOUNCEMENTS

Health Nugget Although they’re often mentioned together, iron, ferritin, and anemia are not the same thing. Iron is an essential mineral your body uses every day. It helps make hemoglobin, the protein in red blood cells that carries oxygen from your lungs to every cell in your body. Iron also supports healthy muscles, brain function, energy production, and your immune system. Think of the iron your body has available to use as your checking account—it’s the “spending money” your body uses to meet its daily needs. Ferritin is the protein that stores iron for future use. Think of ferritin as your iron savings account. When your body needs more iron, it withdraws iron from these stored reserves. A ferritin blood test tells us how much iron you have in storage. It’s possible to have normal iron and hemoglobin levels while your ferritin is low. In other words, your body is still paying today’s bills, but it’s dipping into its savings to do it. As those iron stores become depleted, you may begin to experience symptoms such as fatigue, brain fog, hair loss, restless legs, headaches, or poor exercise tolerance—even though your routine blood work may still look “normal.”
